“Pat has seen healthcare delivery and pricing from every angle and brings a wealth of experience and momentum to the team,” said Jeff Wells, MD, CEO and co-founder of Marathon Health. “We’ve piloted risk-based pricing arrangements with our clients for several years to huge success, and we’re confident that Pat’s leadership will help us deliver this payment approach to a lot more employers.”

“Primary care and value-based care models are key to transforming healthcare. And it’s a proven way to help employers take care of their employees while reducing costs. I’ve admired Marathon Health externally for some time, and I’m thrilled to be on the inside to help them scale this incredible service,” said Murphy.

Murphy lives in Indianapolis with his wife and two children and is an active leader in the community, including past and present board leadership roles at the Indiana Sports Corp., Indianapolis Cultural Trail: A Legacy of Gene & Marilyn Glick, Bishop Chatard High School, Junior Achievement, Catholic Youth Organization and St. Pius X school.

Marathon Health’s unique healthcare delivery model has attracted a fast-growing and impressive roster of employers, including Tyson, Cargill, New Balance, Aflac and Raymond James, in addition to municipalities, school districts and labor unions across the country.

Its independent primary care model gives providers extra time to build relationships with their patients and remains free of any hospital or health system affiliation. In-person and virtual care is available across 250+ onsite, Network, near-site and virtual health centers nationwide.

Marathon Health patients save their employers $2,000 on average annually and report better management of chronic conditions and their overall health. To date, Marathon Health has saved its clients more than $1 billion in healthcare costs, with the average company saving around $11 million.
